3-Mile Limit Tangle Interests U. S. Government

With attorneys allowed another 30 days to file briefs, determination of whether Los Angeles county's coastline extends three miles from the shoreline or three miles from a line between Point Duma and Palos Verdes hills will not be reached by the California Supreme Court until October, it appeared today.

Federal attorneys made it clear to the court during oral arguments Wednesday that the government is seriously concerned about the beaches, fearing that if the high court should rule that the state line is but three miles off the coastline, the government will be powerless to prevent ships from discharging bilgewater too near the beaches where thousands gather every week.

Irld D. Breet, deputy U. S. attorney, said District Attorney Ben Harrison had filed a brief as a friend of the court upon the California Supreme Court until Federal attorneys made it clear that Murphy gave instructions to file the brief during his recent visit here, however. It was filed May 27, court records show.

The government also would be powerless to regulate fishing within three miles of the shoreline if the high court upholds the split opinion of the District Court of Appeal holding that Santa Monica Bay is not in reality a bay, Breet said.

Deputy State Attorney Bayard Rhone argued that the courts had held that the state railroad commission had authority to fix rates between the mainland and Catalina Island, thus admitting that state jurisdiction extended more than three miles off shore. He also cited a number of cases including the Ocean Industries case, wherein the high court had defined a bay.

Shoestrung Denied Improved Fire Protection

Request of the Los Angeles-East Torrance chamber of commerce, for better fire protection for the district, has been filed without any action by the Los Angeles city council, on recommendation of its police and fire committee.

No funds are available at this time for expansion of the fire department, the committee's report stated.
